The Collect.

O indwelling One, please accept what love we as humans can manifest. And transform it that it may be useful to shower upon others so they may receive the compassion you continually show to us, O God everlasting throughout the ages of ages. Amen.

The Epistle for the 4th Sunday after Trinity is from the Book of Emerson.

Love is divine and deifying, it is the beauty of humanity. It makes the human without limit. Through it the soul first knows itself, and it corrects the capital mistake of the infant human. These infant humans seek to be great by following other so called great people, hoping to derive advantages from the other person. This can be corrected by showing the fountain of all good to be in each of us, and that all of us equally are inlets into the depths of reason. When love warms us, we choose good and great deeds. Then deep melodies wander through our souls from supreme wisdom. Then we can worship and be enlarged by our worship; for we can never go behind this sentiment. In the sublime flights of the soul, true love is never surmounted, love is never outgrown.

Here Endeth the Epistle.

The Gospel for the 4th Sunday after Trinity is from the words of Eckanker Master Paul Twitchell.

God is love; God is life; God is spirit; God is all. That is true no matter whether we are young or old, Jew or Gentile, Oriental or Occidental, regardless of creed or colour. There is no way in which God can be left out of his own Universe, nor can we leave ourselves out of it. We will do ourselves a great service if we ask God what we must do in order to avail ourselves of His universal love and to live the life craved by the soul. Practice the art of love and you will find that His love becomes contagious. You then have found the path leading to spiritual consciousness.

Praise Be to Thee O Christ.
